"Hi, Mickey," Goofy called from his rocking chair on his shaded porch. "Come on up and sit a spell and cool off."

"I believe I will," said Mickey, wiping his brow. "It sure is hot."

"Yup, that's why I'm just sitting today and doing nothing," said Goofy.

Starting up the porch stairs, Mickey tripped on a loose board.

"Ooh!" he gasped, as he went sprawling.

"Gawrsh, Mickey, I'm sure sorry," said Goofy, helping Mickey to his feet.

"Well, if you don't mind my saying so," Mickey replied a little annoyed, "you ought to be fixing that step instead of just sitting and doing nothing. Someone could break his neck!"

As Goofy nodded, Mickey went on. "And look at your railing — it's about to tumble down! If anyone touches it, it'll crack!"

"That's right," Goofy replied. "But it seems I just can't get to fixing it."

"Looks like you just need a little get-up-and-go, Goofy," said Mickey.

"Yup," sighed Goofy, "but where do I go to get it?"

"Well, sometimes we have to make it ourselves, by starting things," Mickey replied. "Once we get started, we get in the swing of it and a job is done before long."

After Mickey had left, Goofy thought, "He's right. All I need is a start and then I'll get right in the swing of it."

At that, Goofy went to his tool shed.

"I'll need a hammer and some nails," he thought, as he stepped into the shed . . . right on the prongs of a rake! Whop! The handle of the rake connected with his head! With a sigh, Goofy moved the rake aside.

"Let's see," he muttered, as he looked at the stack of things on his workbench. "There's a hammer here somewhere."

Pawing through the stack Goofy soon found his hammer . . . it slipped from the table to land on his toe!

"Ow!" he yipped, stooping to pick it up. Then, "Ooh," he groaned, as straightening up, his head hit the edge of the bench.

Things had begun badly and for a moment Goofy almost gave up. But Mickey's words were fresh in his mind, so he grabbed a package of nails and the hammer and, full of determination, went to work.

Goofy tackled the loose board and pounded in one nail, two nails, three nails. Already things looked neater, and he felt better. The job was begun, and he was beginning to feel some of that get-up-and-go. Then, with a pop, the other end of the board sprung up! Goofy put it back in place, but it popped up again. He pushed it down—pop! Down—pop! Finally, Goofy won. As the board stayed down at last, he placed a nail on it and brought the hammer down with a hard wham—and missed!

"Yeowch!" he yelled, grabbing his thumb.

Now, with aching head and smarting toe and throbbing thumb, Goofy took to his rocking chair to think things over. He was still there when Mickey came by later.

"Well, I see you did some work," Mickey said coming up the steps . . . only to trip on the loose board and fall again!

"What happened?" he asked. "I thought you had fixed that loose step."

"I was fixing it," sighed Goofy. "I did just like you said." Then, relating his troubles, he finished, "But that's it, 'cause when I hit my finger my get-up-and-go just got up and went!"
